Massimo Tavoni is research associate at the Princeton Environmental Institute and senior researcher at Eni Enrico Mattei Foundation (FEEM). His research is about energy and climate change economics. He focuses on the evaluation of international climate mitigation policies, with a focus on technological evolution and uncertainty, and the role of tropical deforestation. He is also interested in the consumption patterns of environmentally stressful goods, especially in countries in economic transition.

Dr. Tavoni is one of the two lead authors of the paper "Sharing Global CO2 Emissions among 1 Billion High Emitters," published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences. The paper proposes to use individual emissions as the best, fairest way of calculating a nation's responsibility to curb its output of carbon dioxide. The methodology does not mean that individuals wo
