

the case of China

China's economic growth has been remarkable since the late 1970s, with an average annual growth rate of about 9% from 1978 to 2004. This growth has been driven by a combination of factors, including a large labor force, a high savings rate, and a strong emphasis on infrastructure development. The government has implemented a series of reforms, including the opening up of the economy to foreign investment and trade, and the implementation of a market-oriented economic system. These reforms have led to a significant increase in China's economic output and a rise in living standards for its citizens.

China's economic growth has been remarkable since the late 1970s, with an average annual growth rate of about 9% from 1978 to 2004. This growth has been driven by a combination of factors, including a large labor force, a high savings rate, and a strong emphasis on infrastructure development. The government has implemented a series of reforms, including the opening up of the economy to foreign investment and trade, and the implementation of a market-oriented economic system. These reforms have led to a significant increase in China's economic output and a rise in living standards for its citizens.

China's economic growth has been remarkable since the late 1970s, with an average annual growth rate of about 9% from 1978 to 2004. This growth has been driven by a combination of factors, including a large labor force, a high savings rate, and a strong emphasis on infrastructure development. The government has implemented a series of reforms, including the opening up of the economy to foreign investment and trade, and the implementation of a market-oriented economic system. These reforms have led to a significant increase in China's economic output and a rise in living standards for its citizens.

China's economic growth has been remarkable since the late 1970s, with an average annual growth rate of about 9% from 1978 to 2004. This growth has been driven by a combination of factors, including a large labor force, a high savings rate, and a strong emphasis on infrastructure development. The government has implemented a series of reforms, including the opening up of the economy to foreign investment and trade, and the implementation of a market-oriented economic system. These reforms have led to a significant increase in China's economic output and a rise in living standards for its citizens.

Table 3: Arrivals of Chinese migrants by country, for selected years ()