

It goes without saying that energy transition is a difficult process.

This process not only affects all institutions, markets, and consumers in the energy sector but it also has ramifications in a variety of fields at the global, national, and local levels.

As a result, universal and prototyped approaches to energy transition should be avoided.

Appropriate policies should be developed in light of the unique circumstances of each country.

In this context, Turkey also